

Finding Journal Articles

- You need peer-reviewed articles, found in scholarly journals, for your academic research. This means the article has been written and evaluated by experts in the field prior to publication. Need help determining a scholarly article from a regular magazine article? Ask your professor or librarian, or check this chart.

- Many scholarly articles are not often found full-text, free of charge, online. This is where your library's databases come into play! Databases are large, searchable collections of scholarly articles and books. You can often find full-text articles through our databases, as well as information on the articles we have here in the library.

- You will need to select the databases that are right for your topic. Different databases cover different subjects. You can find Geneva's database page here. In addition to databases grouped by subject, there is also a link for an A-Z list of databases. Directions to accessing the databases from home can be found here.
- Once you select your subject, you will see some 'Top Picks' at the top of the database list. These are a great starting point for your research. Always include Academic Search Ultimate in your database selection, as it is our largest, multi-disciplinary database. Additional relevant databases are listed underneath the Top Picks.

Search

- The videos below will take you through the steps on finding articles in our databases:
 - Basic Database Search
 - Advanced Database Search
- When using the databases through our website, you can tailor your search to find what you need.

The image shows a screenshot of a search interface with four tabs: 'Filters', 'Search options', 'Publications', and 'Subjects'. The 'Filters' tab is selected and highlighted with an orange underline. Below the tabs, the section 'Limit your results' contains three checkboxes: 'McCartney Print Journals', 'Full Text', and 'Peer Reviewed'. Below this, the 'Date' section has five radio button options: 'All time' (which is selected), 'Past 12 months', 'Past 5 years', 'Past 10 years', and 'Custom range'.

You will want to select 'Peer-Reviewed' for scholarly journal articles. You can limit your results to full-text only, but if you are not finding enough sources, you can leave Full Text unchecked to see resources that can be requested via InterLibrary Loan. Articles through ILL usually arrive quickly, within a couple of days.

- You will see results from your search, and you can select 'Access Options' to see if the article is available immediately. You also have tools available in the upper right – citing the article, downloading, etc.:
